

Snubbed All Around.

The London Morning Post—generally regarded as the organ of Lord Palmerston and the English Ministry—states that England will have nothing to do with Louis Napoleon's proposed Congress. If this announcement be correct, the probabilities are that the project will fall to the ground. England has long been the faithful Achates of France. Hand in hand these loving friends have moved up and down the world. They have at length, however, parted company. The indications for some time past have been, that the entente cordial was about to be broken off. England commenced to turn her back upon the "Nephew of his uncle" in Mexico. Her next act was to refuse to unite with him in an offer of mediation to our Government, and now she repudiates the Congress proposition.

Russia has already, according to the telegraph, sent in her reply, and it was to the effect that the Emperor would have no objection to dispatch a representative, after the pacification of Poland, or in other words after the question is settled upon which it is supposed the Congress is to deliberate. Prussia has asked for information. The course of England will probably determine, not only that power, but the great majority of the German nationalities, to give the Emperor of the French the cold shoulder in this matter. If in the face of these declensions Louis Napoleon should go on with his Congress, he will make himself simply the laughing stock of Europe. The idea of France, with two or three second class nations, assuming to sit in judgement on the affairs of the world, would be an evidence rather of the audacity than the wisdom of the individual from whom it emanated.
